NOTE ON THE COVER PICTURE: Hon. E. Barrett Prettyman, '15, Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, gives the principal address at the Testimonial Dinner for Rev. Francis E. Lucey, S.J., in celebration of his fifty years as a Jesuit and thirty years as Regent of the Georgetown Law Center. The able chairman of the Dinner, William S. Abell, '36, sits behind Father Lucey. The dinner was served in New South Hall on the campus and was attended by 800 Alumni and friends of the honoree.
Pleasant it is to pay tribute to a man whom one admires. More pleasant it is when the substance of the tribute is not only the sweet, thin incense of personal affection but the solid substance of character and service and achievement. Most pleasant it is when the subject of the tribute is not in the past, to be recalled from down the corridors of memory, but is present, living, expectant, bright-eyed—half embarrassed, half puzzled, but withal thoroughly pleased. As we of the Class of 1915, in our customary scholarlly fashion, would put it: officium gratum, officium gratius, officium gratissimum. Such is my privilege tonight.

The first scene of our story is laid at Malden, Massachusetts, a modest residential town some half-dozen miles north of Boston. In the year 1891; the month is August; the day is the 2nd. It is Sunday, hot and rainy. The feast of St. Ignatius Loyola, customarily celebrated on the 31st of July, has been postponed to the 2nd of August. On Boston Common in the midst of afternoon showers some fifteen thousand people watch the Boston Hurling Team outhurl the O'Briens, to the discomfort of all proper Irish Bostonians. Amid all these portents a male child was born to Jeremiah and Hannah Lucey, the former over from the County Cork and the latter from county Kilkenny. The father was a building contractor, and the new baby was the fourth of a family which eventually totaled eight children. They named him Francis Edmund.

This youngster's schooling began in the public schools of Malden. Then at age 10 he went west to visit his uncle, the Reverend Patrick Lucey, who was the parish priest at De Graffe, Minnesota. The visit lasted five years. The formal part of Francis's education continued at Waverly Academy, a parochial high school, but Uncle Pat and his maiden sister, Kate, who kept house for him, added some touches of their own.
Sure and idleness was no good for man or lad, for it is the devil as we know who finds use for unbusy hands. So the boy learned to drive his uncle about with horse and buggy on pastoral calls in Minnesota snow, and in Minnesota prairie heat, and on sick calls at all hours. He learned to play the piano and became an accomplished violinist, a proficiency which he began to organize and lead jazz bands. Sure indeed, also, 'twas better that a garcon early learn that he must earn his leisure and his pleasures, and so young Lucey acquired the means to meet his boyish needs by trapping mink and muskrat on Minnesota streams and lakes, not a business for the lazy or the chicken-hearted. At age 15 he came back home and continued his schooling at Boston College High School.

This Frankie was indeed a tough 'un from the beginning. In Boston he earned his spending money working Saturdays and vacations as a butcher boy. Where? In Faneuil Hall Meat Market, no less—the Cradle of Liberty! And he took on wrestling as a sport. But, although he had the brawn and the brains of a wrestler, there was not enough meat on him for top-flight competition. So he was not too good at it. But he won a gold medal for scholarship at high school, was valedictorian of his class of 414 boys, organized and directed several jazz orchestras and later a church orchestra, then founded a college hockey team, and took some turns at dramas.

But always, from the earliest his family remembers, this boy had his heart and mind fixed upon a religious life in the Jesuit Order. He entered the novitiate at age 18, took his first vows two years later, and in 1923 was ordained in Dahlgren Chapel at Georgetown. His Bachelor and Master of Arts degrees he earned at Woodstock, where he also took his theology, and since then a Doctorate of Philosophy and a Bachelor of Laws at Georgetown. He has two LL.D.'s and a J.U.D. He began at once to teach, first at Loyola School, then at Fordham, then at Loyola College in Baltimore, and at Georgetown. He has taught metaphysics, canon law, ethics, the history of social thought, religion, psychology, jurisprudence, civil procedure, torts and legal bibliography. And, as if that were not enough, he has been president of the Jesuit Philosophical Association of the Eastern States. In some of his many idle minutes he was for a while supervisor of curricula of all the Jesuit colleges in four states and the District of Columbia. In 1939 the law alumni of Georgetown gave him a watch so he could keep track of the time.

As has already been indicated, our second scene is the District of Columbia, the Capital of the Nation. In the year 1870, on the hills west of Georgetown and overlooking the Potomac River, lay a university already well-nigh a century old. Her infancy had dated back to the first settlements on the new continent, when in 1634 a Catholic priest in St. Mary's County, Maryland, started a school. That school moved about a couple of times in the original land of pleasant living, and then, when a century and a half after her birth the first Archbishop of Baltimore proposed the establishment of a college, she was moved to the present, and also pleasant, site on the Hilltop and became an academic institution. Later she was transferred to the Society of Jesus and incorporated by authority of the federal Congress. She took her name from her neighbor, the old city, and chose as her own two colors reminiscent at once of the heroism of her sons in a bitter warfare and of her grief at their fratricidal slaughter. She already boasted a medical school and a graduate school when in 1870 a doctor and two lawyer friends proposed the establishment of a law department. It was done. The new venture was located downtown in Washington, near Judiciary Square, the home site of the courts and locale of lawyers. It opened its doors to 25 students, of whom in two years it graduated ten. The new department moved about a bit, as restless youngsters do, until it was 21 years old, but it then settled down at the address we all know so well, and it has never moved again.

This is not the time or place to recount a history of Georgetown Law School. Rather let me suggest some of its qualities which contribute to the makeup of it and of the man we are assembled to honor.

Georgetown is a place of tradition. Its roots twine back into the soil of southern Maryland, the Free State, in the very earliest days of that Colony. It boasts on its faculty list a long roster of great names. Four Justices of the Supreme Court taught here, and some thirty of our local judges have done so, among them Shepard, Smyth, Gould, Stafford, O'Donoghue, Hoehling, Adkins, Laws, and a long list of others. Practicing giants of the courtroom have taught here—Darlington, Hamilton, Baker, Douglas, Perry, Hogan, Easby-Smith, Laskey and many more. And of scholars we have had many—such great ones as William J. Hughes, Raleigh Minor, Boutel, Keigwin, and now our own Krontein and Walter Jaeger. Georgetown has enormous pride in its history.

Georgetown is a hardy institution. It has been battered by world wars, by depressions, by competition, by radical changes in economic conditions and modes of living. It has never closed its doors. Since 1891, the year Father Lucey was born, it has not changed its address by so much as one number. It has never been acquired by anybody, nor has it ever acquired anybody else. Overall, despite dips and rough water, it has come from 6 teachers offering 25 students ten courses to more than 50 teachers offering 1200 students 71 courses. Georgetown Law Center as an institution is as tough as the proverbial boot.

Georgetown has always had a forward look. In the beginning it was an evening school, and those of us as old as I am look back with affectionate nostalgia to the opportunities it afforded boys who were compelled to earn their keep while studying. The school shifted its schedule as the profession of the law changed its characters. Teachers offering 25 students ten courses to more than 50 teachers offering 1200 students 71 courses. Georgetown Law Center as an institution is as tough as the proverbial boot.

Georgetown has always had a forward look. In the beginning it was an evening school, and those of us as old as I am look back with affectionate nostalgia to the opportunities it afforded boys who were compelled to earn their keep while studying. The school shifted its schedule as the profession of the law changed its characters. Teachers offering 25 students ten courses to more than 50 teachers offering 1200 students 71 courses. Georgetown Law Center as an institution is as tough as the proverbial boot.

In the early 1930's the central character in our first scene and the institution in our second scene came together, became intertwined, and each became part of the other. Francis Edmund Lucey became Regent of the Georgetown Law School in 1931. The School progressed into a Center. It became not merely a place of learning law but a mode of living the law. The student body increased, and students moved into dormitories to live at the Center. The faculty increased in number and in strength. The curriculum took on the new phases of law born of new economics, new business, new industry, new science. The library grew. Student activities multiplied. To the Journal and the moot courts were added legal aid, continuing education, retreats, actual aid to lawyers appointed by the courts in defense of indigents, a bar association.

Father Lucey carried on the great tradition; he not only maintained it, he moved it forward into this vast new era in which we now live. He was trained and originally destined for a life of scholarship, but his financial genius has been responsible for the phenomenal growth of the institution in his charge. Perhaps chief among his characteristics as an administrator have been his unremitting determination to look always ahead and his persistent initiative in raising the standards of Georgetown to a notch or two above those of the other leaders in legal education. He has been the vision of a prophet, the zeal of an apostle, the prudence of a bishop.

Apart from his manifold duties as Regent of the Law Center, but standing upon the same foundation which supports Georgetown, Father Lucey has in recent years engaged in another major undertaking. He has challenged the mighty cult of Oliver Wendell Holmes. Seemingly alone at first in this impertinent audacity, our good Father now finds himself surrounded by a myriad of like-minded but less reckless souls who were apparently merely waiting for somebody to blow the bugle.

Mr. Justice Holmes was, of course, a great justice and a great lawyer in many fields of the law, a great phrase-maker; also he was strikingly handsome, and he lived a great many years. Undoubtedly also, his position and vote on the controversies before the Court were in the main sound and far-seeing. In none of those areas would anyone dispute the earnest proclaiming of his followers that he was great. But the magnetism of his virtues has drawn men into the orbit of his philosophy. The tide of the cult has threatened to engulf the whole of our profession. The area in which Father Lucey would do battle is in the philosophy which undergird and overlay all the Olympian Yankee did or said or thought.

This is not the time or place for a catalog of the Holmesian tenets. Suffice it for our purposes to say that Father Lucey, having read all that Mr. Justice Holmes wrote, reaches emphatic conclusions supported by quotations from those writings. Holmes's underlying bases, says Father Lucey, were agnostic, materialistic; they included propositions that no significance is to be attributed to a human being, different in kind from that to be attributed to a baboon or a grain of sand; that law is the current will of the dominant power; that rights are the whim of the dominant power; that truth is merely the road one can't help following; that "I can't help" is the ultimate; that the sacredness of human life is a purely municipal ideal of no validity outside the jurisdiction. Having thus assayed the philosophy of the Great Dissenter, with, as I have said, copious notations of quotations, Father Lucey moves in to the attack. And here, I suggest to you, his voice is the voice of Georgetown. This is the bedrock upon which our Law School was founded, and upon which it operates. Without inquiry or statistical proof I venture to say that when I phrase my own views on this fundamental, I reflect the views of the men of Georgetown.

If there is a bit of space left somewhere in the ranks of your supporters, Father Lucey, where a small figure might squeeze in, I would like to occupy it. My father taught me, in many discussions, what he summed up in a terse sentence: "This is a moral universe." And he often elaborated on that theme with many variations. I am content to take my place alongside you and him. But more than that, with increasing certainty as I emerged from the bravado of adolescence, slogged my way through the mires of middle age realisms, and came into the bracing air of relaxed elder contemplation, I have become more and more convinced of that premise which is basic with my father and you. A Creator, God, who is the Father of all mankind, is the only basic thesis that makes sense to my mind.

The concept of an Intellect of the Universe is, of course, mysterious—as mysterious, perhaps, as eternity, or as space measured in millions of light years, or as the precision mechanism of a gnat's eye, or as the transmission of this very thought from my mind to yours. But, even though not understandable, such a concept is believable. The alternative concept, that all nature, all matter, all life, with its movements and colors, its hopes, its fears, its comings and goings, just happened without initial impulse or plan or purpose, is utterly unbelievable. I can believe the one, and it makes sense to my mind; I cannot believe the other, for to me it is impossible of belief.

And a code of moral law, inherent in the nature of man, implicit in the Fatherhood of God, is the only subsidiary thesis which explains conditions plainly observable by my senses. Moreover, if those two theses be not true, then certainly much that we are doing, or trying to do, in this world makes no sense at all. If Holmes was right I see no purpose in any of it; and of course there would be no purpose—everything would be merely happenstance. If there is no Fatherhood of God or brotherhood of man, if man indeed is merely an animated lump of mud or a super ape, if rights are only the concessions of the powerful and law is the whim of the mighty, I see little or no rationale in any of the whole business. If I believed in the philosophical musings of Mr. Justice Holmes, I would see no reason why we of the fit majority should not breed fit compatriots and sterilize the unfit as we do prize cattle; or why we should educate the uneducated or civilize the uncivilized; or why the mighty in any area should not slaughter the meek, the few, the weak. If no rights are absolute and all morals are but soluble customs, I would certainly rid myself of the restraints of decency, the so-called obligations of parenthood and citizenship, and would attach myself to the banners of some outstanding force who could lead me to the lush and the enjoyable. No, Father, in your current joustings you are the champion of all we hold precious; the faith to which we tie, the stars by which we guide, the sweet, the certain, the satisfying in life, and that destiny which is the destiny of all of us. We of Georgetown are proud that our alma mater has furnished you the forum and some of the weapons for the battle.

I do not argue Father Lucey's position for him. I merely point out that he speaks on these subjects in tones that harmonize with the choirs of Georgetown. I like the music of those choirs, and I think all of us here do.

Father Lucey, in August of the year 1891 there were five Sundays. You were born on the first one. I was born on the fourth one. Therefore, as a younger man—by three weeks—speaking with deference and respect to his elder, I congratulate you on this anniversary and wish for you many more such. I propose that you and I drink a toast de Seneciute. Here's to Malden, Mass., and Lexington, Virginia; to the year 1891 and the month of August therein; to friendship and friends; to the law; and here's to Georgetown! Let's make your 100th anniversary a dilly!
Few parents comprehend the possible future increased cost of a college education and even fewer parents have an adequate plan to finance their children's college educations according to a recent Ford Foundation Study entitled "Parents' College Plans Study" (hereinafter referred to as the Ford Survey).

The Ford Survey, which was conducted during the week of April 5, 1959, involved a cross-section sampling of 5,011 heads of families having 6,295 children under eighteen years of age who were not then attending a college or university. Results of the Survey indicate that, on an average, parents expect 70% (4451/6295) of their children to attend college but that 60% of the parents questioned who expected a child to attend college had no financial plan established to meet educational expenses.

As to the 40% of the heads of households who answered that they both expected to send at least one child to college and who had established a specific plan to finance the expenses involved, the median amount set aside last year was a mere $150.00. Parents classified as being in a "high economic level" (as defined below in Table I), however, saved a median of $670; those in an "above average economic level," $230; those in an "average economic level," $130; and those in a "below average economic level," under $100. Although half of the parents questioned had no definite idea of how much a college education costs, the other half thought that one year at college would involve a total outlay of from $1075 to $1950 per year, according to the respondent's economic level, or a median of all respondents of $1450 per year. Since parents, according to the Survey, expect to pay 70% of their children's college costs, it is significant to note that at the median rate of $150 per year it would take at least ten years to save enough to finance one year at college assuming the cost of going to college should remain constant and assuming the cost estimate is correct.

According to the Ford Survey, the total amount anticipated for college expenses per family ranged from $7,800 among families in a "below average economic level" to $15,875 among families in a "high economic level." The median cost of all estimates was $10,000. 52% of the children who would attend apparently would be expected by their parents to go for four years, 4% would study for post-graduate degrees, 9% would take a two-year course and 35% did not know. If the median estimate of total child's college costs by setting aside $150 a year, it would take more than several decades to accumulate an adequate financial position to enable parents to contribute their share of the costs of going to college.

In addition, answers to questions contained in the Ford Survey indicate quite positively that parents expect the future costs of a college education to remain the same as they are now. Why parents believe this in view of the fact that prices of food, goods and services alone have increased 25.5% since 1949 while the cost of tuition at many colleges and universities has more than doubled during the same period of time is difficult to explain. Certainly every indication at the present time is that the cost of going to college will increase. Economic laws of supply and demand alone would seem to augur ill for those who hope to see the cost of attending college diminish or remain constant. Vast capital outlays for expansion of college facilities and increased salaries are two important factors that will probably cause tuition to be increased in the next ten to fifteen years, and it may well be that tuition costs will continue to increase at a much greater rate than the general cost of living index. There is, of course, no consolation to parents in knowing that the cost of living index has increased 25% while the tuition at many colleges has increased at least 100% in the last ten years, since the cost of living index serves as a standard to judge the effect of the increase in non-tuition costs of attending college such as room, board, clothing, medical and other miscellaneous expenses. The discussion at this point has as-assumed that a student would attend college for four years. Should he be required to attend for five years or should he desire to study for a graduate degree a family’s estimate would have to be a good deal higher.

The Ford Survey also asked the minority (40%) of parents who expect a child or children to attend college and who had savings, what type of plan they were utilizing. The responses were as shown in Table I. The first of the two tables indicates an unfortunately heavy reliance on insurance, especially among young people, according to the Survey. As the Ford Survey warned, “Many of these insurance plans may be in the form of benefit provisions to be used in case of the parent’s death rather than the special college endowment policy.” A further anomaly is why many of the respondents in the second table answered that stock investments provided both a higher return and constituted an inflation hedge but only 4% (or one in ten) of the average parents and only 10% (or one in six) of the parents categorized as being in a high economic level had invested in common stocks.

An interesting contrast may be supplied by reference to a recent survey published by the Boston Fund indicating that an average of 57% of the assets of 47 college endowment funds have been invested in common stocks.

Three inescapable conclusions of the above summary of the Ford Foundation Survey are:

Parents generally are not saving enough to assure their children of a college education.

Parents have failed to consider future increases in the cost of becoming educated.

Parents at all economic levels may not be investing their savings properly to assure the economic ability to finance a college education.

Since close to half of the parents not expecting their children to attend college assigned a lack of money as the reason and since most parents are apparently not adequately planning for the future education of our Country’s children, even in instances where they are financially able to, it appears that Americans need to know more about the economics of higher education and must adopt a more systematic approach to saving for a college education. A failure of our colleges and universities to foster proper understanding of the financial problems to be encountered at a parental-individual level as well as those being encountered and widely publicized at the collegiate level will cause our free enterprise system of college education to fail in its duty to supply our Nation and the World with the educated talents so badly needed at all levels of mental endeavor.

*The Ford Survey classified each parent on the basis of his standard of living as shown by his house and other possessions with relation to others in the same area. The median income of all those canvassed was $4,525. Those in a high economic level earned over $10,000 a year; above average, $6,825; average, $4,575; below average, $2,425.

GEORGETOWN'S RHODES SCHOLAR

By HARRIET GRIFFITHS
Star Staff Writer

The 21-year-old senior and president of the Yard at Georgetown University will be off across the ocean next fall to take up the study of law at England's Oxford University.

Awarded a coveted Rhodes Scholarship, he plans to spend the next two years and possibly a third studying in Britain for the profession of his choice. After a try at the British bar examinations, he hopes to return and take an American law degree.

A lawyer educated in Europe and in America will have a distinct advantage in the wide scope of legal affairs of the future, George believes.

Such infant fields as space law, he says at the risk of understatement, "will take lawyers interested in civic affairs on a big scale."

George is majoring in philosophy at Georgetown, not only for its own interest but as a good background for a lawyer.

He credits the honors study program he is taking at Georgetown with much of his success in winning the Rhodes Scholarship. Two of the important concepts of the course, he explains, are very small classes with top professors, and an emphasis on studying from original texts, rather than textbooks.

George, nicknamed "Peppy," has shown unusual leadership ability at the university. He was president of both his sophomore and junior classes.

As president of the Yard, he heads the college student council. He is the representative of the college to outsiders as well as of the students to the school administration. He presides at athletic pep rallies and as master of ceremonies for various events.

With the Yard office annexed to his dormitory room, his suite is a focal point for students with activity planning assignments or problems.

"It's kind of like having your cot in your office," he says.

George's voice already is being heard beyond the campus. He is a member of a panel of eight area students holding a series of discussions for broadcast overseas by the Voice of America.

A firm advocate of participation in civic affairs, George says he has tried during his school years to interest as many people as possible in student government, and extend the area of student participation.

One of his most admired public figures is a fellow Texan, Senate Majority Leader Lyndon Johnson. He also has a deep respect for President Woodrow Wilson "because he brought so much to his office."

George's family goes back 100 years in Texas, he says, but happenstance made him a "naturalized Texan." He was born in San Francisco while his mother was visiting there.

After finishing at Georgetown, he says, he probably will go back to his usual summer job teaching water safety in Dallas before leaving for England.

He believes in taking the long view of swimming safety, too. It is important to cultivate foresight rather than merely to act after the fact, he says. This means being alert for signs of potential trouble before it happens — an obviously uncertain swimmer, a bather hugging the ropes, or a youngster who jumps into the pool straight from lunch.

He looks at his intended legal career in the same light. Foresight, he maintains, comes with a thorough background. He plans to get a good one.

When the work day ends in the nation's capital, "responsibility" moves out of the great marbled buildings of space and atom harried Washington, and goes home to ten square blocks of charm. Its name—Georgetown—embedded serene in the heart of the youthful capital, is but a mere five minute drive from the White House.

What distinguishes it from other antique villages is the accumulation of responsibility represented by those who people it. Many of the men and women who chart the nation's political course, administer to its economy, mold its foreign policy and shape world opinion, live in its brick and clapboard homes of another era.

On Wisconsin Avenue, Georgetown's Main Street, you may outrun one of the country's most feared newspaper columnists for a taxicab. At the drug store you may sip a soda beside a Senator, or jostle against a former Secretary of State at the grocery store. Walking the tidy brick paved side streets you may pass a Supreme Court Justice, a Cabinet Officer, a retired ambassador, or a business tycoon diverted to Government employ.

Georgetown's unique lure is its charm. What Chelsea is to London, what Greenwich Village was to Manhattan and Montmartre to Paris, Georgetown is to Washington. National figures returning in the evening to Georgetown enjoy a daily reunion with history.

Here George Washington sat down at Suter's Tavern with the Frenchman Pierre L'Enfant to plot a new capital city in the woods and swamps to eastward. At the Union Tavern John Randolph of Virginia played whist while his will was revised on the night before his duel with Henry Clay. Here, too, passed Washington Irving, Talleyrand, Jerome Bonaparte and John Adams. Thomas Jefferson lived here while Secretary of State. Georgetown not only predated Washington by a half century, but during the capital's youth Georgetown overshadowed it as a center of civilization. It was not until the middle of the nineteenth century that Washington began to swell from a small southern village to something like the metropolis it is today. Tourists in Washington are still misinformed by guides that the national capital was placed on the Potomac site because congressmen wanted to be close to Georgetown's taverns. While this is a charming bit of fiction, the fact is that the choice of the site was the result of a compromise, in the first years of the Republic, between the North and the South.

With the opening of the railroads in the mid-1800's, Georgetown's decline set in. The new capital began to grow and Georgetown's well-to-do moved there in stride with the fashion. By 1850, it lost its reason for being, and by the first World War it was little more than a slum.

Georgetown's return to glory and elegance is one of those fantastic real estate stories. It began in the early 1920's. Newcomers to Washington discovered the fine architecture, which laid hidden under the decay of what had come to be considered hovels, and began buying Georgetown houses for a song and restoring them. In the 1930's, the process was accelerated when intellectuals and the artistically minded began to scan the Washington area for an atmosphere in tune with their temperament. This they found in Georgetown, and the real estate boom was on. Unbelievable prices were paid for sites which returned the buyer little more than a fine Federal facade. In most cases an entirely new house had to be put behind it.

The dominant motif is still the salmon-pink brick facade with simple Federal lines and intricate grill handrails, but interspersed are homes of peppermint-pink, pale green or off-white with shutters in a contrasting color. Ivy covered walls, brass door knockers, coach lamps, brick paved sidewalks—these are Georgetown.

Although at Christmas carolers still sing under the lamplights, and in summer the residents still dine with candelabra on the lawn, there is nothing “small town” about Georgetown. While its residents are apt to be wealthier, paunchier and grayner than the pioneers who “discovered” it some 30 years ago, it has acquired a new importance as a power center at the heart of one of the world’s great capitals.
